their version of fine

An encounter with someone else's good enough.

🕒 15 MINUTES

THE MESS

1. Think of someone in your life who seems easier on themselves about happiness than you are — someone who can enjoy something without seeming to grade it. It could be anyone: a friend, a family member, a colleague.
2. Write down one or two things you've noticed about how they move through good moments. Not what they do to pursue happiness — how they seem to be when it's already there.
3. Write down one thing that approach makes possible for them that your approach makes harder for you.

Notice: what the gap between their approach and yours reveals about the standard you've been holding yourself to.

NO OUTCOME REQUIRED.
