THE MESS

1. Before you do anything else, take stock of your current conditions: How much sleep did you get? When did you last eat? What's the mood in the room — at home or at work? What happened in the last two hours? Write it down quickly, just facts.
2. Now think of something you're currently stuck on. Look at your conditions list. How many of those things are actively shaping how you're thinking about it right now?
3. Ask: if the conditions were different — better sleep, different space, different time of day — would this problem look the same? What part of this is really you deciding, and what part is the conditions you happen to be inside?

Notice: how much of what feels like a personal conclusion is actually a snapshot of a moment.
