

S · SURRENDER

wrong questions

An encounter with the possibility that you're asking the wrong thing.

🕒 10 MINUTES

THE MESS

1. Write down a question you've been carrying — something you're trying to work out or understand, in work or life.
2. Look at your question. Who are you picturing when you imagine solving it? Is that person — or that angle — actually the right place to start? Write two versions of the question that put someone or something else at the center.
3. Sit with the rewritten questions. Don't answer them. Notice whether they open the situation differently.

Notice: how the shape of a question determines what kinds of answers are even possible.

NO OUTCOME REQUIRED.
