

Y · YIELD

process that resists analysis

An encounter with making that doesn't produce anything.

🕒 15 MINUTES

THE MESS

1. Make something with whatever is immediately available — arrange objects, make marks, move things around. Start before you decide what you're making.
2. At some point you will feel the urge to make it make sense — to yourself or to someone you're imagining showing it to. When you feel that urge, do something that makes the thing harder to explain, not easier.
3. When time is up, don't document it. Let it be a process that existed and is now complete.

Notice: the difference between making something and making something for something.

NO OUTCOME REQUIRED.
