the second conversation

An encounter with what someone close to you might only be able to tell you later.

THE MESS

1. Think of someone who recently came through something significant — a project, a transition, a hard stretch. Not still in crisis. Write down how they described it at the time, or how they've described it to you since.
2. Think about what they haven't said yet. Not what they're hiding — just what might not be visible to them yet. The part that tends to surface weeks or months after. The low. The question. The thing they'll mention one day in passing and you'll think: that was always there.
3. The next time you're with them, leave a little more space than usual. Not to extract information. Just to make room for what hasn't surfaced yet.

Notice: whether you find yourself listening differently when you're not only listening for what they already know.

NO OUTCOME REQUIRED.
