

S · SURRENDER

the return is the path

An encounter with repetition as the mechanism, not the obstacle.

🕒 15 MINUTES

THE MESS

1. Write down one thing you keep returning to that you have been treating as a sign of failure. A worry, a conflict, a way of responding that you thought you had outgrown.
2. Read what you wrote and ask: what if returning to the same ground is not a sign that you haven't moved? Growth doesn't always travel in a straight line away from difficulty. Sometimes it circles back through the same territory — but from a slightly different height each time. What changes if you apply that idea to what you just wrote?
3. Write one sentence describing what the return looks like if it is part of the process rather than proof that the process has failed.

Notice: whether accepting the loop makes it easier or harder to move through it.

NO OUTCOME REQUIRED.
